Least Favorite Roommate Accidentally Added To Classified Bar Crawl Group Chat

Leaked screenshots of messages from a "classified" bar crawl group chat have emerged after a group of U-M students living at 1267 Vaughn inadvertently included their "least favorite roommate," Geoffrey Goldsmith, in the chat.

Peter Chadseth, ringleader of the bar crawl, issued this memo to the unsecured chat stream:

"TEAM UPDATE: TIME NOW (2100et): Weather is FAVORABLE. Just CONFIRMED w/CENTCOM we are a GO for mission launch. Push GarBar NOW." An hour and a half later, he followed it up with a second directive: "2230: More Ricks LAUNCH (2nd strike package)." Reports indicate Chadseth had "no idea" that Goldsmith had been added by "incompetent OPSEC advisor" and "resident of the smallest basement bedroom" Michael Walsh.

Responding to screenshots displaying the text "Walsh added Goldsmith to the chat," Walsh claimed in a press release that he "did not add Goldsmith to the chat."

"Team, I have an exam tomorrow so I'm not gonna make it out," responded another roommate, Jimmy Varnce. "But I think we're making a mistake. Geoffrey does most of the dishes, and I'm worried that there's a real risk he doesn't understand why we aren't inviting him. The best reason to do it is clearly because he's about as fun as a wet paper towel. But there might be serious repercussions here. I'm willing to support the consensus of the team and keep my mouth shut. But there's a strong argument for at least inviting him to BLep."

During hearings conducted in the living room of 1267 Vaughn immediately following the leak, Chadseth explicitly denied that the contents of the chat were "secret plans." Additionally, Chadseth claimed that he could not divulge any further information on account of the "plans" being "secret."

At press time, Goldsmith voluntarily left the group chat, claiming "it's not like [he] even wanted to hang out with them anyway."

Entire U-M Dearborn Campus Deported Without Due Process

Following reports that the Trump Administration has ordered the deportation of legal, permanent residents around the country, local sources have indicated that the entirety of the U-M Dearborn campus has been detained without trial and is currently being held at an unknown location.

Several witnesses present at the scene claim that at 9 a.m. on Monday, non-uniformed officers who refused to produce any kind of identification descended onto campus and began arresting everyone in sight. Simultaneously, several large cranes bearing the ICE seal began lifting buildings into the sky.

Residents of Dearborn, the only majority Arab-American city in the country, were quick to decry ICE's actions.

"Every detained person was a lawful resident of the United States—or a building," said Dearborn Mayor Abdullah Hammoud. "These detentions are blatantly racist and Islamophobic, and our community is entitled to due process under the law." Meanwhile, Republicans have claimed that the University's mission of providing a "quality education at an affordable price" is a "threat to the national security interests of the United States."

Trump Administration officials have said little on the matter so far but claimed in a press briefing that the detentions constitute an "ordinary exercise of executive power" by targeting the U-M Dearborn campus "simply because so many of the students are Muslims."

In response to the mounting outrage from the Dearborn community and the rest of the country, the U-M Regents released a statement saying that they are "cooperating with the federal government to figure out where all those buildings went… oh, and the people too."

The entire excavation reportedly occurred while upwards of 50 Liberty Security guards were on the scene, watching over the campus.

All Of Your Group Members Apparently Got Off Fifth Round Of Waitlist Admits

Recent polling reveals that U-M students are broadly unified in their hatred of collaborative assignments due to project groups typically being "exclusively composed of fifth round waitlist admits."

"All three of my group members have told me they each got into the University of Michigan on August 30. I didn't even know they let people in that late. Surely they had enough applications to admit people other than these three. Do we really have to scrape the bottom of the barrel?" said Claire Stevens, LSA Senior and participant in a group project for COMMS 401. "Last week, one of our group members asked me if the book we were assigned to read was a true story. It was a biography about Alexander Hamilton. Until now she thought it was based on the musical."

"I often have really bad imposter syndrome and I think it's because I got off the waitlist," explains Sarah Price, an LSA sophomore. Friends of Price believe she has imposter syndrome because "she is an imposter. She has a GPA of 1.8."

Others have reported they too have been in group projects with "late-round waitlist admits." Connor Boggins, Ross Junior, claimed "Every group project I've been in at this school has been full of waitlist admits. I am starting to wonder if U-M lets anyone in during the regular decision window."

Boggins reports his group members often "have trouble opening a new Google Doc and don't seem to know how to type on a computer."

The group members reportedly seem to share hobbies such as "scratching their heads" and "staring at the wall."

Union Basement Black Hair Care Vending Machine Ready For Whenever University Starts Accepting Black Students

A single basket marked "White Guy Hair Stuff" is set to be introduced next to the YOUniversity Beauty vending machine and will be stocked entirely with Just-For-Men's 7-in-1 "dandruff-control shampoo, conditioner, moisturizer, toner, motor oil, industrial grease, and electrolyte beverage."

The "minority haircare" vending machine in the basement of the Michigan Union has been fully stocked with durags, bonnets, and hair glue in preparation for "whenever Michigan starts accepting Black students."

Launched in 2022, the "YOUniversity Beauty" vending machine project recognizes that "haircare needs vary widely by race," and that the University needs to prepare for "the edge case that it may one day enroll Black students."

Despite its seeming irrelevance to the broader campus community and inconvenient location, the University has chosen to make the vending machine a stop on its campus tours for prospective students. The Director of Undergraduate Admissions said that "We feel liberal whites are an underrepresented minority at Michigan and are actively engaged in strategies to increase their enrollment. So, it's not that we're going to let any of the Black students in, but we're looking for students who like the idea of having Black classmates."

"I love the Black people," said White Freshman Sarah Clawson just loud enough for a Black man walking by to hear. "The machine makes me feel good about going to Michigan. Sorta superior to other universities. You could say I walk around with a sense of racial supremacy."

At press time, the Italian Student Association was lobbying for an "Italian haircare" machine that would sell "enough grease to reverse 70 years of progress against anti-Italian stereotypes."

A big shout-out to our writers this time around! We had so many high-quality submissions across the board that we had a very difficult time cutting down to our 30ish articles. Always great when everyone's firing on all cylinders. This is our penultimate issue of the year. That's crazy! Hopefully our juniors got the seniors some very nice senior gifts. Nothing too expensive, just in the mid triple digits would be fine. Cash acceptable. I'll save all the sappiness for next cycle, but just know I'm already sad. Shout out to Dan for the Twix bar. BTW, I've been slowly working my way through the comedies of all time. 30 Rock, Arrested Development, Curb Your Enthusiasm, Veep, Seinfeld. All I can say is, wow you guys were right, these are pretty funny. Bummer Alec Baldwin killed that woman.

Chili Leftovers Finally Defeated After Heroic Seven-Day Fridge Battle

Brown unfortunately "overcorrected" for the chili incident the following week, making five straight meals in which he failed to cook enough food to satiate himself. "I guess I should've known better than to only roast three medium-sized carrots for dinner," he said.

The Department of Fridge and Leftovers Affairs (DOFLA) released a statement late Monday evening indicating that the long-fought battle with chili night leftovers had finally reached its conclusion.

"We are proud to announce, on behalf of the fridge of Patrick Brown, that after seven days and nights of intense battle, we have finally defeated the 8-quart pot of chili," said a DOFLA spokesperson. "It wasn't easy. It took perseverance, bravery, and a commitment to eating the same meal twice a day for a week, but we've done it—we've neutralized the threat."

Patrick Brown, owner of the fridge, said that he "never could have anticipated" the kind of warfare he was wreaking on his home when he decided to cook up a batch of his mom's chili.

"I had no idea that it was a recipe meant to feed 20," Brown said. "I guess I should've been tipped off by the 'five pounds of ground beef' and 'six cans of diced tomatoes' but I wasn't really paying attention. It made sense at the time."

Brown said that in the future, he's going to meal prep in smaller quantities, focusing on small, single-serving recipes like lasagna, chicken casserole, and an entire four-pound pork shoulder.

As of press time, DOFLA noted that they had already begun preparations to begin a new offensive.

Bar Drink Airborne

Breaking reports from Bab's Bar and Lounge have claimed that a drink was seen airborne.

Just minutes ago, chaos erupted within the usually quaint speakeasy. While drinks often rest on the bar's countertop or tables, witnesses have claimed that a select beverage was soaring through the air with "a concerning velocity."

"I'm sorry I'm still shaking, this whole thing was just so unexpected," said Bab's patron Lila Rhodie. "I mean, usually people hold their drinks in their hand—like this—and then take a sip out of it, right? Well I can't imagine it was possible to consume any of that [drink] when it was up so high and moving so fast."

While spectators are divided on the contents of the glass, after analyzing evidence at the scene, investigators have determined that the beverage was a Vodka Redbull, a Tequila Sunrise, or possibly a Paper Plane.

"Now we can't simply go ahead and assume it was thrown," said Deputy Charlie Gleauton. "However, evidence suggests that there was indeed a force great enough to propel this drink into the air. We are still determining whether or not foul play was involved."

Bab's has commented that "99.99% of [their] drinks do not move as such."

Multiple experts have confirmed that the glass containing the drink was likely "not designed to generate enough lift to remain airborne for an extended period."

Girl Who's Always Cold Gearing Up To Complain About Always Being Hot

As temperatures have begun to warm, sophomore Alice Knop has started to shift gears from complaining that she's always freezing to complaining that she's always sweating.

Throughout winter, Knop's friends and family were unable to escape her constant comments about how cold she was.

"I don't understand how she was so cold," explained her roommate Jessica. "She'd be under like five blankets while asking us to turn the heat up because it was 'so frigid in this place.' At a certain point she actually purchased one of those heat lamps for cold-blooded animals and she would just lay in front of it for hours."

Now that it's hitting low-60s every day, Knop's taking a new approach. While sporting a daily uniform of jean shorts and tank tops, she's been telling everyone she sees that it is just "unbearably hot in here" no matter how high the AC is.

"I don't understand why no one else is this uncomfortable," Knop reasoned while popping a large ice cube. "Like it's literally 65 degrees out and my entire body is just dripping in sweat. They can't make it a little colder in here?"

Due to her extreme temperature sensitivity, Knop has long maintained that she is the biggest victim of climate change. "I'm at the mercy of the elements, so it's much easier when I can predict what's going to happen. When there are hypothermic temperatures one day and then heat stroke-inducing the next, my body just doesn't know how to react. It makes my pre-pre-menopause so much worse," explained Knop, who is 19.

At press time, Knop was seen opening all the windows and then putting on thermal underwear on a 50 degree day.

Gay Bar Opens In Ann Arbor Targeted Towards Bisexual Women Who Only Date Men

According to files from the City of Ann Arbor Department of Business, the downtown district is opening a new gay bar, Stargazer, that targets bisexual women who only date men.

The new bar is owned and operated by local Ann Arbor entrepreneur, Nick Normus. Across Southern Michigan, Normus owns and operates twelve Hooters.

"With only boyfriends having to pay cover, it brings a lot of women, but not the man-hating lesbians. Thankfully, it's usually the hot ones who want to give their boyfriends a bit of a show with the other chicks," said owner Nick Normus while glancing through a Hustler magazine.

"Now, with this new queer-centric bar, the guys can buy drinks, stand around awkwardly, and watch ladies dance just like any other club," said Normus. "The focus here isn't on drag nights or inclusive events. It's mostly just to watch a consistent crowd of girls who like dancing with other girls."

The bar contains a number of state-of-the-art attractions like a glowing dance floor, thirty speakers, and a fifteen foot one-way mirror the owner looks through from his office.

"Just because I have a boyfriend doesn't mean I don't want to go enjoy telling people I'm bi at parties," said Joanna Kelter, whose friends confirm she's only dated men. "We definitely need more inclusive places for me to be gayer, and I'm always more of an activist after a few drinks."

Atheist Woman Still Religiously Shaves Entire Body Every Saturday Night

Despite rejecting the idea of a higher power, local atheist Claire Mitchell remains devout in her ritual of shaving her entire body every weekend before heading out on the town.

"People always ask me how I can find meaning in life without faith," said Mitchell, "But honestly, I find a deep sense of security in preparing my body for whatever unholy events will occur throughout the night," Mitchell stated while making sure to shave her toe hair. Mitchell, who describes herself as a rational person, still finds comfort in believing in inexplicable events.

"If I ever forget to shave, I just know I'm going to meet the hottest guy of my life," she admitted. "And I know that any decent guy will be absolutely disgusted by the smallest bit of body hair," stated Mitchell, who refused to elaborate how this plan will work in the long run.

"It's about the things that give you hope," she explained. "I imagine that successfully mingling at the bar provides the same level of comfort as someone in deep prayer." Sources close to Mitchell confirm that her plan is dysfunctional, but her undying reliance is inspirational.

"I guess we all have something we believe in," said roommate Jenna Lopez. "For some, it's God. For Claire, it's that she'll find a normal, boyfriend material guy at a bar after hooking up the first night."

At press time, Mitchell stated "It's easy to shame me and jump to conclusions, but if I have a lame night, I can still rely on the joys of rolling around in bed with freshly shaved legs."

Uh Oh! Professor About To Collect Worksheet With Doodle Of Them On It

Friedman reportedly received a score of 2/5 on the worksheet, with the professor acknowledging his meticulous attention to detail.

After assigning an in-class worksheet to his SOC 101 lecture, Professor Tremblay decided that his students "ought to turn the work in" so that he could "monitor class progress and attentiveness" minutes before class was over.

According to several students in his class, this last minute decision was "shocking." Junior Marco Friedman said, "I didn't do the assignment. I was doodling Professor Tremblay all class. I drew his rectangle glasses, bald spot, hairy mole, and the coffee stain on his shirt. In pen. He's gonna know it's him. It's not my fault he has such pronounced features."

"I thought in-class work was fake, optional at best. I just drew one hundred cubes all over the worksheet. And knives and skulls. And a big 'X' over a stick figure of the professor. I considered eating my assignment instead of turning it in because I'm going to seem psychotic…I hope he's not a mandatory reporter," explained sophomore Charles Bee.

Having reviewed the assignment, Professor Tremblay vowed to never collect in-class work again. "It was harrowing to see what students think I look like and disappointing that no one answered the question. It was easy, 'What has been your favorite part of class this far?'"

At press time, Tremblay was seen taking down the mirrors in his house and signing up for therapy for "unrelated reasons."

Paper Plate Award Ranked Most Effective Way To Let Someone Know How You Feel About Them

A recent poll conducted by the University of Michigan Psychology Department found that students feel most comfortable sharing their "true and repressed feelings" about their peers by means of a paper plate award.

LSA Junior Noah Traub, who participated in the study, said, "As social chair of my acapella group, paper plate awards give me the special and very public opportunity to highlight little quirks about people and gently reprimand bad behavior. I keep it subtle like 'Most Likely to Drink Water at the Water Fountain,' 'Always Unprepared,' and 'In Need Of Attention.'"

Study participant and LSA Freshman Barbara Meer was recently given the paper plate award "Miss Independent" at her sorority event. "Ugh, this sucks! You show up to two date parties alone and you're a freak. I sort of thought these guys were my best friends. I guess not… I mean other peoples' awards were 'Most Enchanting Smile' and 'Most Likely To Save A Sick Orphan.'"

"I was awarded 'Most Distinct Smell' this year, 'Weirdest Walk' last year, and 'Most Likely To Work For The IRS' the year before," said Ross Junior Mark Bloomfield, whose intramural basketball team gave him those honors. "No one would tell me what they meant by that but everyone also unanimously agreed it was true. I don't get it, but I'm hurt."

At press time, Traub was deciding which "annoying freshman" he would "forget" to make a paper plate award for.

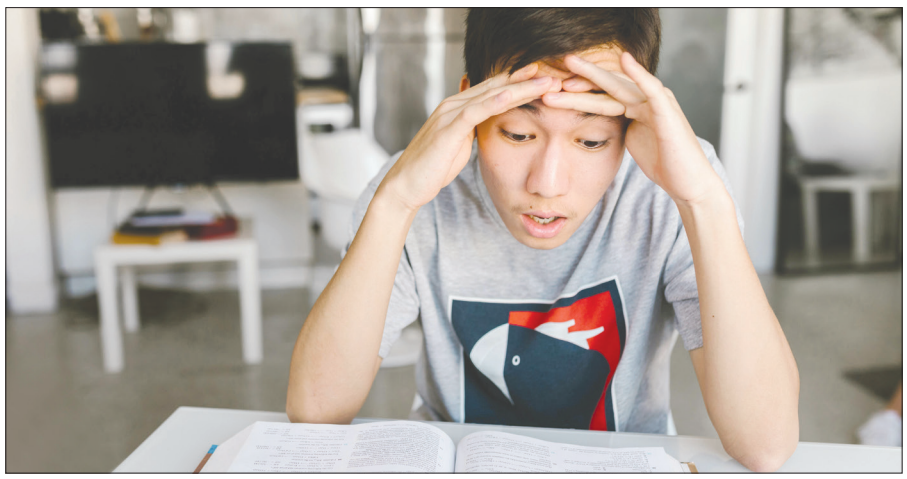
Kindle Users Intrigued By New Book Format Using Paper



Teitre also criticized the fact that these paper books provide no way to check the battery percentage.

In recent weeks, swaths of Kindle users have expressed a growing intrigue in an alternative book format that uses paper and pages.

Since its launch in 2007, many readers have sworn by the Kindle for its ergonomic features and near-immediate access to millions of books. However, following a video posted by "BookTok" influencer JackieReads, people have begun to explore what she has dubbed a "new age" of reading.

"I'd never heard of 'em before, and it's no wonder: these [paper] books are objectively terrible." said Paula "Jackie" Teitre. "They don't glow in the dark, and you can't just press down on the page when you wanna highlight something. But I think it's the inconvenience that makes them so interesting."

Users initially encountered difficulties when navigating paper books, as reading physical material requires a technique called "page-turning." This can be particularly challenging to master, especially when the pages stick together, which has demotivated some beginners from ever finishing a book.

"Yeah it was hard to get the hang of at first, but now that I've read a few, I've started to really embrace it," said avid reader JoJo Bear. "I've been using an oil lamp to read when it's dark, and this little method called a 'dog ear' for important passages—like those that make me seethe with rage."

At press time, Amazon announced an initiative to inscribe select novels in slate slabs.

U-M To Capitalize On White Women With Spring Break Tans For Diversity Pamphlet

University photographers were last seen trying to get the tan White women to try more "urban" poses.

After returning from a spring break trip to Mexico, Claire Smith, a junior at the University of Michigan, has been approached by multiple University photographers in an effort to get her to pose for photos.

"So many random people have been asking if I want to pose for the University. Just the other day an intern came up to me and begged me to pose for MDining. She also asked me to bring friends that 'look like me,'" said Smith, "After the photo when they asked me for my name they looked confused when I said Claire Smith."

Junior Julie Jackson had a similar experience when a photo intern asked her and her friends to pose in front of Trotter Multicultural Center. "I was in the union with my friends and they made us walk all the way to Trotter. I thought it was a random place to take the picture, but it's a nice-looking building I guess."

Chris Martin, head of Photography for the University described their recent endeavors, saying, "We have been trying to show off the diversity of our campus to let everyone know they are welcome. We want to give the minority students a chance to shine."

At press time, Jackson was seen on the cover of the University's new DEI 2.0 webpage.

CS Major Secures Prestigious Amazon Internship At Local Fulfilment Center

Sources report that area computer science major Vincent Powell has managed to beat the sluggish job market, and has secured a prestigious Amazon internship at his local fulfillment center.

"I'm honestly amazed that this happened," Powell said. "I applied to hundreds of internships and got ghosted or rejected from all of them, and yet in the darkest hour I managed to get something at one of the big FAANG companies. Things are really turning my way man, I'm telling you."

The hiring manager at the fulfilment center that hired Powell said they were greatly impressed by his knowledge of the inner workings of the facility. "When we interviewed him he kept going on about how passionate he was about sorting algorithms," the manager said. "I don't understand why anyone would care so much about which of our boxes go where, but hell that's the job, so he's a good fit."

Powell's working conditions have been different from what he expected, but so far he's been taking it in stride. "I really like hiking," Powell said, "so when I discovered I'd be getting my forty thousand steps in every day I was really excited. They've even given me these cool bottles for refreshment, although weirdly enough they seem to be empty at the moment."

At press time Powell was seen "using his proficiency in Java" to brew coffee at 5:30 in the morning before heading off to work.

Chill Senior One Day Closer To Just Being Unemployed Alcoholic Draft-Dodger

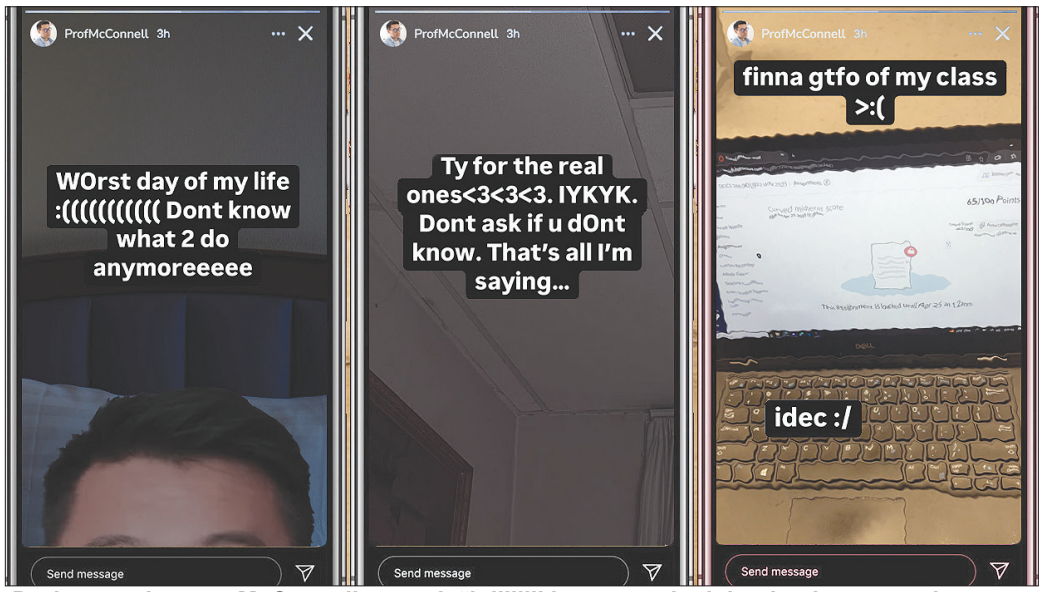
As winter semester nears to an end, "chill" senior Conner Berry is one day closer to becoming an unemployed, alcoholic draft dodger.

Berry admits that his situation soon cannot just be sugar-coated as "a bad case of senioritis" and instead "alcoholism, unemployment, and lack of motivation." He longs for the days when "a 2pm Corona in POLSCI 303" was considered commonplace and not "failing to fulfill major obligations at work, school, or home due to repeated alcohol use," a symptom of alcoholism according to the Mayo Clinic.

"I know a midday buzz would not be acceptable in a professional workplace setting, but I just hate how I get all sweaty and shaky when I'm not drunk," said Berry. "Luckily for me, I don't have a job lined up, so I don't have to worry about that!" He reminisces on the "good 'ol times" when a work lunch consisted of "cocaine with a side of valium and either purple, red, or green lean."

In the worrying case that the US enters war due to deteriorating international relations, Berry has also been attempting to come up with medical exemptions that would help him evade a potential military draft. No longer eligible to defer enlistment based on being a college student for the last six years, Berry plans to invoke his excuse involving "flat feet and a bad allergy to amoxicillin."

Professor Reveals Midterm Scores Via Instagram Stories



During one lecture, McConnell posted, "lollllllll just got asked the dumbest question everrrr. SOMEbody didn't read McConnell pages 110-270 like they were supposed to!"

Students report that engineering Professor Romeo McConnell took to his Instagram story to reveal their midterm scores.

"WOrst day of my life :((((((((((((Dont know what 2 do anymoreeeee," Professor McConnell bemoaned over a selfie with only the upper half his face showing. He then posted a photo of his ceiling with the text. "Ty for the real ones<3<3<3. IYKYK. Dont ask if u dOnt know. That's all I'm saying…"

Elias Gardiner, a student in the class who saw the story explained how he had "been watching Canvas for hours, waiting for [his] grade to sharply decline after that midterm. The last thing [he] expected was to get an Instagram notification from an account called @ProfMcConnell and see [his] account tagged next to a warped photo of a laptop Canvas page displaying a 65% with 'finna gtfo of my class >:(' and 'idec :/' written over it."

"Honestly I didn't mind it," said Sienna Stroud, another student in the course. "I mean, is it unconventional? Sure. Probably a FERPA violation? Yeah. But it makes me feel better that so many people scored worse than I did. Also it's way easier now to pick groups for future class projects."

At press time, Professor McConnell was seen watching AI generated voiceovers of Reddit posts over videos of Minecraft parkour challenges and Fortnite victory royales on his iPad instead of answering student questions in office hours.

Scam Text Job Offer Looking Like Most Viable Option

Following a challenging job application cycle, LSA senior Noah Thompson has accepted a job from a scam text.

Thompson was allegedly "scrounging for literally any entry-level job" when he received a message from xxxhelloofferjobxyz.now.respond@icloud.com that was offering a $75/hour remote job to "update data." "It was like God smiled down on me," explained Thompson. "I've been on the hunt for something that seems too good to be true, and this job is exactly that."

"What really stood out to me is how much the company cared about me as an individual," stated Thompson. "They said that my resume was the best one they've ever seen. Not exactly sure where they got my resume, but it's awesome to see that my Michigan degree is paying off."

After the initial message from the recruiter, Thompson was quickly onboarded. "The signing process was surprisingly easy," commented Thompson. "All I needed to do was submit my credit card information because they wanted to make sure I got my signing bonus the second I received the contract." The job reportedly offers additional benefits. "All employees who submit their fingerprints and social security number get full health coverage. I think I'll probably get veneers just because," expressed Thompson.

According to insider sources, it is unclear what the job is. "I can't find anything about the company on Google," stated Ross senior Velma Barton. "Noah's saying it's a really exclusive start-up, but how are you going to start up if no one knows about you? I've been trying to warn him, but he keeps accusing me of spreading propaganda for "'Big Job Market.'"

At press time, Thompson was getting a call from the PNC Bank Fraud Department.

Father Would Like You To Know You Looking Less Fat These Days

Jason Wenker appears to be far less aware of trends in his own weight than those of his daughter.

Reports indicate that Jason Wenker, father of sophomore Julia Wenker, sparked raucous sympathetic concern after a reunion in her hometown prompted him to announce that she's "looking better these days."

Jason, 57, notably asked her if she's "finally slimming down," despite having seemingly answered the question for himself and only humoring her with a plea for her own thoughts. Mistaking nervous laughter for permission, Jason then launched an inquisition into the causes of her twenty-pound weight gain dating a year prior, wondering in particular if it was "'cause of the Prozac." Jason only moments later steered the entire dinner table into what he believed to be a totally unrelated, apropos-of-nothing conversation about Ozempic.

An investigative probe launched into Jason's intentions has produced mixed conclusions. Researchers are unclear whether his subtle monitoring of dessert consumption points to a projection of his own body dysmorphia, a hopeful slippage into a more innocent time when they could say anything they wanted to each other, or perhaps even an unlikely show of concern for Julia's well-being.

Surges in weight-related comments have been concluded to align with an increase in such epithets as "pal," "bud," and "kid," as well as a more frequent use of the conjunction "but" after I-love-yous.

Man Wrestled To Ground By Own Comforter

Local man Aaron Wang slept cold last night after his comforter was arrested on assault charges after wrestling him to the ground.

Police reports confirm Wang had returned from spring break and just hours had completed his annual sheets-washing. According to his roommate, Wang allegedly tried to stuff the comforter into the cover completely unprovoked, but official police reports omit this detail, instead stating that after a protracted wrestling match to get the comforter to "not just curl up in the corner" the comforter subdued Wang and left him on the floor, where police later found him drooling and asleep.

The police report also places a blanket, fitted sheet, and several anime body pillows near the scene of the crime, but none responded to a request for comment.

Wang's roomate, Bob, who has asked only to be identified by his first name out of concern for his safety, said that relations between the two had gotten particularly tense in the past few weeks, with the comforter accusing Wang of "sleeping with another man."

Bob recalls the scene differently, saying that, although it was dark, what he observed was "definitely a consensual three-way between the comforter, pillow, and Wang; at least that's what it looked like. Not that I was watching."

At press time Wang is facing charges for attempting to suffocate his mattress with a fitted sheet.

Lebron Admits To Stealing Stephen A. Smith's Voice, Keeping It In A Shell Necklace

The All-Powerful Sea King, Triton, refused to comment on the ongoing feud. However, he did announce that all seven of his mer-daughters would be joining the LA Lakers Cheerleading Squad.

After being confronted by NBA star Lebron James, basketball commentator Stephen A. Smith chose to address the situation during his ESPN segment. His audience, however, was "baffled" by his "unusually meek" attitude. Lebron later revealed that he had "stolen that little bitch's voice" and is "keeping it a shell necklace."

A longtime fan of Smith and avid basketball watcher Madison Braggs tweeted, "Why is Stephen speaking with the cadence of a man who just found out they hit the second tower???? He's like a kicked puppy! What did Lebron do to him? Where's the passion? Where's the screaming? Where is my Stephen A. Smith?"

In response to questions, Lebron revealed during an interview the exchange which had occurred: "He was running his mouth about my son. Stephen just has a way of grating on your nerves, and I thought I had to do something about it. I told him my forgiveness wouldn't cost much, just his voice. Now," he said while holding up a shell necklace, "I'm storing it right here. What can I say? Being the King has its perks."

When asked to comment, Smith, accompanied by a talking crab and seagull, responded, "I have a lot of fea- I mean respect for Lebron James. I think I could be a lot more kind in my commentary, and from this point forth I won't even raise my voice a little on this show. Whatever Lebron wants."

At press time Smith was seen searching for Lavar Ball, in hopes that a kiss from him would restore his voice.

Milk Drinkers Break More Bones, Mostly From Getting Punched

A new study released Wednesday found that individuals who regularly drink milk sustain broken bones much more often than the general population, with the primary cause being "blunt-force trauma inflicted by others."

The study, conducted by the National Institute of Dairy Research, analyzed over 10,000 emergency room reports and found that milk drinkers were four times more likely to suffer fractures–particularly to the nose, jaw, and orbital bones.

The study also found that 92% of milk drinkers who sustained fractures had verbally expressed a strong opinion about milk within moments of their injury. The most commonly cited phrases preceding an altercation included "Milk is objectively the best drink," "People who don't drink whole milk are weak," and "Water is overrated."

One individual, 24, suffered a fractured jaw after telling a group of friends that "milk is the perfect standalone beverage." The attending ER physician noted in his report that "[the] dude won't stop talking about fucking milk."

In Virginia, reports of an altercation at a bar warranted authorities to intervene. Upon arrival, the bartender on duty told the two officers "That zoophile asked me for a pint of milk." The officers learned from the instigator that the milk drinker stated he "[wishes he] could take it straight from the udder" before they, too, made sure he would be "drinking milk out of a straw the rest of his life." The instigator later told reporters, "It actually was harder to break his bones."

Guantanamo Bay Cancels Migrant Welcome Party

DoD officials say party supplies from Abu Ghraib were unavailable and currently being loaned to El Salvador.

Sources report that after all migrants were ordered to be removed from the Guantanamo Bay detention camp, the military prison guards, staff, and black masked torturers were seen taking down nearly $500 worth of welcome party decorations and food.

"This is humiliating," said Senior Waterboarding Manager Stephen Higgins. "I mean we go through all the trouble of putting together a nice little shindig for the new arrivals. And now it's all gonna go to waste. This really pisses me off… fills me with a lot of pent up aggression I just don't know what to do with," said Higgins holding a prisoner by the throat.

The $500 of "essential" equipment includes $20 of jalapeno poppers, a $75 Karaoke Machine, a $350 solid oak crate known as the "sweatbox" which is used to confine prisoners in a tight space until they break, and also $18 worth of "Ring Pops."

"I'm bummed the party is canceled. I had so many fun party games planned," said the Head of Guantanamo Bay Recreation and Associate Testical Clamper Brian Mason.

Internal documents show numerous party games were cancelled including "pin the tail on the political dissident," "Scalding Hot Potato," "Simon Says Don't Look Me In the Eye," and "Solo Musical Chairs" which is where a single player is put in a dark room, chained to a stool, and forced to listen to the same song for forty-eight hours straight.

At press time, Guantanamo Bay staff were seen feeding current, non-migrant, prisoners the unused party sheet cake through every hole but the mouth.

Man Sure Coming Recession Will Be Kind He Uniquely Benefits From

As markets around the world reel from the effects of haphazard tariffs, American political instability, and mass layoffs, one man is proud to announce that he believes the upcoming recession will "probably be a good thing for him."

Fred Radford said in a statement released last Tuesday that a "housing market crash" would "finally allow [him] to buy a home," and "probably have no other ill effects on [his] invested savings or credit availability."

"Honestly, I hope there's a recession haha," said Radford. "Prices would finally go down! I'm sure there would be no corresponding decline in the price of labor though. I bet wages would totally stay the same or maybe even grow in real terms."

Economists around the country agree, saying that while a recession would be bad for the vast majority of working Americans given the associated mass unemployment, retirement fund devastation, and vanishing opportunities, it would "definitely positively affect this one random guy," and "we should all cross our fingers and hope that it happens."

"Yasss bring it on I say! Burn it all down!" said Radford, who claimed to have an "excellent" working understanding of markets, federal debt, and countercyclical macroeconomic policy. "I hope the U.S. economy crashes. Like turning the whole thing off and back on again. Probably a good thing, right?"

At press time, Radford was said to have burst into tears upon checking the value of his Roth IRA.

LinkedIn Users To Receive Free Tin Cup With Purchase Of Premium

LinkedIn is reportedly considering adding a piece of cardboard and a Sharpie to further incentivize users to purchase a Premium membership.

On Monday morning, popular professional networking platform LinkedIn announced that users will receive a tin cup with their purchase of a Premium membership.

The cup—crafted from an alloy of tin, copper, zinc—can be used for a multitude of purposes including heating up canned beans over a modest fire, acting as a small drum in moments of musical whimsy, and, of course, collecting spare change.

"As a company whose goal is to support the career growth and professional success of our customers, we want to provide our Premium users with whatever tools they may need to tide them over in their job search—be that exclusive online skill development courses, detailed insights on profile views and engagement, or a metal cup with which to rattle coins around while wearing a tattered cloak and carrying a cane," said LinkedIn CEO Ryan Roslansky.

Many customers seem to be in favor of the incentive, citing the cup's practicality and ability to contain money.

"I've been debating on whether to get Premium for a while now, but I think the tin cup seals the deal," said recent computer engineering graduate Jonah Reed. "I don't think my #OpenToWork banner is enough to really sell the level of desperation I'm going for. Recruiters like it when you seem desperate, right? By the way, do you have any spare bills on you? Or food?"

At press time, Reed was spotted tying a sack of his possessions to the end of a long, spindly stick.

Pope Confirms Improving Health With Refreshed F-Slur

The Pope's doctors expressed hopes that this is only the first of many hate incidents on his road to recovery.

Pope Francis, Bishop of Rome, has allayed fears of deteriorating health after being overheard spiritedly invoking an anti-gay slur.

The Pope, 88, was admitted to the hospital in mid-February for a bout of double pneumonia and only recently showed signs of recovery, such as standing up on his own and delivering ethically vacuous homilies. A monsignor working in the Vatican Palace believes to have "most provident news," describing to the press a scene he had witnessed in Francis's isolation room:

"His Holiness was clearly struggling with his TV remote's connectivity. After a moment of fumbling about, he threw the remote across the room and exclaimed, 'Chi frociaggine!', with quite some oomph, might I add," said Monsignor Cabolli.

Sister Marina, a nun at the Palace, is similarly hopeful, telling the press the last time she had heard the word from his mouth was when he was screaming it at Stanley Tucci's character during a private viewing of Conclave in October of 2024.

Still, officials are doubtful about the Pope's ability to maintain health in the long run. Sister Marina says she is faithful, citing his increasing mobility. "Whaddaya want me to say," the nun told the press. "He's walking here, for Chrissake!"

Trump Working Hard To Make Stock Market More Affordable For Everyday Americans

Following a slew of Executive Orders in the first months of his second term, President Trump is dialing in to fulfill his promises. In a speech at his Mar-a-Lago estate, Trump promised to work as hard as possible to "make [the stock market] more affordable for everyday Americans."

Press Secretary Karoline Leavitt believes that the high stock prices are a result of the previous administration. Only answering questions from Fox News, she said Trump "fully believes shorting stocks is the best way to stimulate economic growth."

Many GOP members agree with Trump. According to Speaker of the House Mike Johnson, lowering stock prices will "help Americans get back on their feet."

"The cost of living has gone up for Americans, and now they can't even afford to invest in the Nasdaq Exchange," Johnson said. "With President Trump's hard work, I am sure we can get the DOW down from the ridiculous 41,911.71 points to about 6,500."

According to Trump, this has always been on the Make America Great Again agenda.

"We are in hard, hard times, the hardest of times in fact," Trump told reporters. "We need to become great again, proud to be Americans. We need to go back to the golden eras, like America in 1929, or maybe sometime more recent like 2008."

Along with lowering stocks, Trump also plans to experiment with housing bubbles and put the whole government budget on red for a single roulette spin.

Severance Fans Still Stumped By Mystery Of How To Hold Regular Conversation

Following an exciting finale to the second season of hit Apple TV+ show, Severance, many fans are still working through the mystery of how to initiate and hold regular conversations with friends and family.

"For the past ten weeks I've been able to rely on the latest episode of Severance as a conversation starter," said Brooke Jasper, an avid follower of the show. "But I've rewatched both seasons now, and as far as I can tell, the writers left zero clues on how to form a real emotional connection with the people I talk to."

Lauded for its striking visual style and meticulous writing, the latest season of Severance inspired viewers to dissect and analyze the episodes' many hidden clues and symbols. "Discussing the significance of a camera angle or character's outfit gave me unparalleled opportunities to demonstrate how pretentious I can be in conversation," said another fan.

Although some fans have expressed boredom without the show's weekly episodes, others have been able to pivot to different outlets to scratch their investigative itch. "Lately I've been spending a lot of time on 4Chan conspiracy boards," said college student John Redding. "I've found so many like-minded people there who will blindly back up my craziest theories, and not just about Severance!"

With a third season confirmed, but still likely at least a year away from release, fans have had to pass the time by analyzing other shows. At press time, many had taken to sites like Reddit and X to discuss theories about the latest episodes of With Love, Meghan.

New Self-Driving Car Has Passengers Sit In Back Seat While Robot Mom, Dad Loudly Argue In Front

A recent Mercedes-Benz patent includes a built-in system that screams at passengers who ask if "[we're] there yet."

Following the late 2023 launch of Mercedes-Benz's DRIVE PILOT, the most advanced self-driving automation on the market in the United States, the company has announced the release of its "Childhood Nostalgia" package, where passengers can experience an exciting trip with artificial passengers.

"The ability to enjoy a daily car ride without worrying about driving is something many of us haven't had since we were kids," said automotive engineer Jack Carson. "And what better way to bring you back to childhood car rides than the sound of your parents arguing?"

According to Carson, the program uses cutting-edge technology to replicate your childhood. "All you have to do is enter a prompt on your screen, and you'll be able to hear [your parents] argue in lossless audio from state-of-the-art JBL speakers while you enjoy your ride from the back seat!" said Carson. "Before purchase, you can preview prompts our product testers have loved such as 'stressful holiday shopping,' 'brink of divorce being taken out on kids,' and 'really tense silence with occasional angry muttering.'"

Product tester Candace O'Reilly recently posted a glowing review of the program online. "It's great! Simple download process, entering a prompt is easy, and the dialogue is so realistic," said O'Reilly. "The shouting really brought me back to my childhood."

In order to create a more immersive experience, the DRIVE PILOT team reports plans to add an option for fully automated prompts based on user age, demographic, and leaked personal data.

Federal Task Force Targets Columbia University With Funding Freeze, Missile Strikes

Last week, the Trump administration's Federal Task Force To Combat Antisemitism struck Columbia University with a $400 million funding freeze, as well as several AGM-114 Hellfire missiles.

"This has completely upended my academic career. The funding for my undergraduate thesis has been totally undercut by the freeze," explained Robert Mosby, a senior pursuing a degree in economics. "The fact that my dorm has been reduced to a pile of flaming rubble has also been disruptive, as I usually sleep and also live there."

"We understand that this is a time of increasing atomization among our students, but the University would officially prefer its students not be literally atomized by precision drone strikes," said Columbia's interim president Dr. Katrina Armstrong in a recent statement. "Of course, the University remains committed to working with the federal government to address their legitimate concerns."

"The scholarship that helped me afford tuition at Columbia comes from a federal grant, so after this freeze I may have to completely abandon my prospects at higher education," claimed sophomore chemistry major Dana Upton. "It's just not possible for me financially, especially when you account for the medical expenses to remove all of this toxic lead shrapnel embedded in my legs."

At press time, Columbia University released an advisory urging students to "stop getting hit by white phosphorus munitions" as well as to "stop protesting getting hit by white phosphorus munitions."

China Declares Readiness For Any War—Trade, Tech, Clash Of Clans

In a move that has sent shockwaves through diplomatic circles and online gaming forums alike, China has declared itself fully prepared for conflict on all fronts—be it trade, technology, or, most crucially, Clash of Clans.

At press time, a government spokesperson outlined China's readiness for economic showdowns with the West, while also confirming the deployment of a "highly skilled, maxed-Town-Hall-17, gem-loaded" battalion of mobile gamers to defend its digital borders.

"We have weathered tariffs, sanctions, and semiconductor shortages," the spokesperson stated. "Now, we are prepared for the most formidable battlefield of them all—online multiplayer strategy games."

State-backed cyber units, previously rumored to be focused on cyber espionage have been redirected to training elite gaming squads, ensuring that China maintains its dominance in digital warfare. "A national Clash of Clans training facility is already operational, with state of the art iPad cooling systems, computers with carpal tunnel prevention technology, and screen taper to prevent attacks," said the spokesperson. To source these facilities, China has tapped into hidden gem mines in third world clans.

The World Trade Organization is struggling to mediate the latest round of economic negotiations, as Chinese delegates refuse to engage in trade talks unless international actors come out and denounce the "paid victories and corruption."

Second Grader Unsure How To Leave Conversation With Talkative Classmate At Measles Party

The measles party reportedly had a self-serve buffet where "your hands are the serving spoon." According to one partygoer, the dishes were yogurt, soup, and mac and cheese.

After Representative Marjorie Taylor Greene (R-GA) recently promoted group exposure to measles as a way to build natural immunity to the virus, a second grader from Texas has come forward with complaints that her "measles party" fell short of expectations.

"Originally it was supposed to be just me, Kinsleigh, Brinlynne, Braxton, Paisleigh and McKinleigh, but Mom said she wanted everyone in the class to come," explained Everleigh Payne. "It wasn't just measles I needed protection from–I think the real virus was Nevaeh's outfit. Like, it was a measles party, NOT Sunday church!"

"And to make matters worse, Nevaeh wouldn't stop trying to talk to me. She was like, 'I heard we can build immunity through physical contact.' And then she told me the giant freckle on her forearm 'grants you immediate immunity' if you touch it without washing your hands after. Eww! If Mom hadn't been watching me, I would have told Nevaeh to get out because I wouldn't touch her with a ten foot pole. She asked me to play together at recess next week and I said no, so then she started blabbering, trying to convince me to play Four Square or tetherball. I tried to end that conversation so many times but I was stuck."

Everleigh said she has higher hopes for next year's rabies party, claiming, "Mom said that if I survive till then, I can invite who I want."

Democrats Blame Expanding Universe For Red Shift In American Politics

Following months of examination, Democratic party leaders have announced that they now believe the relativistic Doppler redshift, resulting from the expansion of the universe, is to blame for the conservative swing in American politics.

In a report released Wednesday, Democratic party officials stated they now believe the party's defeats in the 2024 elections, and general red shift in American political sentiment, can only be explained by "wavelengths of light being stretched out and shifted towards red on the electromagnetic spectrum by cosmological expansion."

"Some 'political scientists' and 'economists' seem to think that our inability to effectively address real economic concerns experienced under our leadership are to blame," said DNC chair Ken Martin. "But we really feel that this effect of special relativity is the simplest and most robust explanation as to why our messaging didn't resonate with Americans."

"When I cast my vote for an inflammatory and anti-establishment politician in November, I thought it was because I was disillusioned with the institutions and establishment political class the Democratic party built their identity around," said one voter from Wisconsin. "But now that I've read this report, I can see that the concerns I articulated were overblown compared to this astrophysical phenomenon."

Senate minority leader Chuck Schumer concurred with the report saying that it was "unfortunate" their losses were the result of "natural forces beyond our control," but added that "at least we did everything in our power to fight back."

At press time, Senate Democrats also expressed their readiness to "blame it all on trans people if this new strategy doesn't work out."

Trump Claims Harry Potter "Never Should Have Started" War With Dark Lord

In a dramatic reversal of U.S. policy, President Donald Trump declared this week that beloved folk hero and international Boy Who Lived should "never have started" the war against Voldemort.

The move comes as a shock to the wizarding world, who had long considered the United States a top Muggle ally in the fight against "He-Who-Shall-Not-Be-Named." Further contained in administrative briefings were calls to defund the Ministry of Magic and deport all house elves currently on temporary work visa status.

"We're sending what, 350 billion galleons in aid to these people?" said Trump. "And what do we get in return? SLEEPY AL, Albus Dumbledore has been pulling the cloak over America's eyes for way too long. Folks, Dumbledore's woke army needs to be stopped."

Sources inside the administration indicate that before a deal can be reached, a lucrative contract for phoenix feathers and dragon heartstrings is essential. This holdup in negotiations was the alleged justification for the U.S.'s recent 'Nay' vote in a UN resolution condemning the actions of Voldemort. The resolution vote tallies showed 191 countries voting for, the U.S. voting against, and North Korea abstaining.

Following recent negotiations, Trump posted on Truth Social that the so-called Death Eaters "got a bad rep" and many were "very fine people." At press time, he was seen boarding Air Force One on his way to a diplomatic conference with the Dark Lord to be held in Saudi Arabia.

Review: Miss Edna's Tiny Prancers Fall Recital Boldly Redefines The Ballet World

The lights dim. The audience hushes. Fur Elise begins to play softly from the shadows of somewhere around stage right, executed flawlessly at the aging fingertips of Miss Edna, founder, pianist, and senior choreographer of Miss Edna's School For Classical Dance. Slowly, the young dancers emerge from the wings in a single-file line and look out into the audience.

What follows is a two-minute-and-fifty-three-second-long breathtaking performance of resilience, artistry, and drama.

Cassie Hartford, 4, began as the star of the show: completing two pliés and a pirouette before an unfortunate stumble resulting in several dropped ribbons. From there, tension began to build when Sarabeth McLaughlin, 5 ½ , pulled on the pigtails of Brianna Hoffman, who will be turning 6 on Thursday. Hoffman's Oscar-worthy screaming enthralled the audience, even managing to wake up the dads in the last row, while evoking expressions of severe concern from her parents.

In a defiant and boldly individualistic move that not even Bolshoi dancers have dared to touch, Caroline Preaker, 36 months, sat down for the duration of the performance. Her stubborn refusal to follow along with her peers was a thought-provoking performance about what it means to be part of a group, and a reminder that history's best artists have always been rebels.

The Tiny Prancers Fall Recital is Balanchine meets Pepita meets Picasso. It is a wonder of humanity's endurance and artistic devotion. Miss Edna invites all who are interested to attend the Winter Showcase, which will take place in the Holy Cross Church event space sometime in the upcoming months.

'The Barn'

By Chad

That baddie was so fine
I had to make her mine
She was an absolute nine,
Drinking boxed wine

I could tell she wanted me
But was it meant to be?
I asked her for her snap
I didn't have to plea

Had to take her to the barn
The baddie had me tangled up like yarn
She was so beautiful
But I wasn't worth a darn

Now alone in this room
I can't help but fume
In this barn-like home
I sulk in my doom

I Made The Big Red Thing

One day I was transporting several of my favorite big red metal beams across campus and when I was right in front of the UMMA, they slipped out of my hands, falling into the chaotic yet thought-provoking arrangement you see today. I never bothered to clean them up, and the University has been treating the pile like an art installation ever since. Some people might tell you that the piece "means" something, or that the beams are arranged to spell a word, but the truth is that all of those stories are completely fabricated. The beams just fell like that by total coincidence. They're not even fastened together, it would probably collapse and kill you if you leaned on it too hard. Unfortunately, my mistake did also lead to the University hiking everybody's tuition by about $500 per semester. My bad for that.

"This piece came to fruition in the depths of Michigan's winter, largely inspired by the lack of real fire and general heat in the artist's apartment."
